and he guarantees that neither zeal nor attention shall be wanting to acquire general satisfaction.

He is also prepared to receive all kinds of Goods on storage in the Godowns of a large capacity on most reasonable terms.

The Saltpan Hills below Aberdeen have been recommended as a healthy and pleasant residence, and he will find himself incapacitated from the chances of a meeting held in this place about a month ago;—and he would point to the fact of a Cantonese into "Pidgin" English, and rendition by a foreigner. At least I judge so by the retention of a portion of the case may be, to whom the gift of making money has been altogether denied, but on whom Fortune has as if in compensation bestowed the don de plaire in a reasonable degree and to whom consequently some apparently of themselves social advantages which money could not buy. There are many and many rich men who have done with the serious business of life, and who turn to the "trifles" for the pleasure of their later life, and find to their wonder and grim discontent that those trifles are not to be had for the manner for the careless asking, of those who have treated them with contempt for thirty years. It is very disastrous no doubt to pay no attention to making money during the prime of life, or to let the cultivation of society absorb the larger share of time, but if a man intends to do more than leave his money to a hospital and die, when he has made it, then it is also disastrous to neglect society altogether and prepare inevitably for mouldy warfare with it in the later period of life.

This in vindication of the importance of that matter to which attention is called by the article we have already mentioned. Do not let people treat the decent courtesies of life as of no moment, or as if it was of no moment, whether they are done this way or that way. It is very important indeed that whatever society we take, may be taken in the right way. It means just the difference, very often between a pleasant, enjoyable life, of which the time is agreeably filled and one of discontent and wearisome ennui. But some one may say "society is all very well, but you are talking of calls and of all the——hores I know of calls are the worst. "The blanks would be filled up to a certain extent in accordance with the sex and habits of the speaker, but the meaning conveyed would be upon these no doubt. The fact that people have this hatred of calls, is the great proof that they are clumsily managed, because if society is pleasant, these it is peculiarly pleasant to take it at that house and at that time which suits you best. When you go to a house by invitation it may be pleasant to do so or it may be the reverse, but even if it be pleasant there is this awkward feeling about the pleasure up to the moment that you enter on it, that you cannot be sure whether when the appointed moment comes you will be inclined for it or no. The call therefore which you pay when the inclination is upon you and which at any moment can be abridged at your pleasure, ought to be the most natural, easy and agreeable form in which society can be taken. The call need not be a bore, but on the contrary may be a refined and highly civilised form of entertainment, and when it is otherwise there is something radically wrong about the local rules by which it is governed.

We say the local rules because while the most important points connected with the conduct of civilised man amongst his fellows, are as it were regulated by world wide laws, the social statutes relating to calls differ very widely in different countries. In some parts of Germany nothing is commoner than for people who have to attend a ball in the evening to take advantage of the careful toilet they have made, to drop in at half dozen houses on the way, and discharges their little debts of ofiicity by candle light. In London of course certain hours of the afternoon are clearly recognised as those in which calls may be made and there is a perfect understand ng as to the evenes which give people a right to call, or make it incumbent on them to call as the case may be, at certain houses. Most people probably who have any acquaintance with the ways of life in continental capitals would agree that on the whole the London system is by far the best. As the English common law is said to be, the London calling system is, the perfection of reason. It rarely requires a man to call at a house where he does not want to go, and rarely makes it possible for him to go to a house where he is not wanted. It enables him to attend to the work of the day whatever it may be, and then pay his calls at leisure, sipping them as it were, and enjoying them as a man who has dined and is at peace with the world may enjoy good claret. With the full knowledge of a civilised system, however, the communities of Hongkong and apparently of Shanghai, have deliberately adopted one which is the most barbarous and idiotic that could possibly be devised. Not alone is the time fixed for calling, one at which it is quite impossible to enjoy the leisurely feeling so necessary to the pleasure of such a visit, but strangers are actually expected to call first on residents. New comers are expected to go about thrusting themselves into unknown houses and the presence of ladies to whom they have never been introduced, like so many Paul Pry's "hoping they don't intrude" Men accustomed to that delicate regard for other people's feelings which is at the foundation of true social etiquette, would rather give up without society altogether than do this. The hours and rules meanwhile will shoulder their way about and give horrible annoyances to unfortunate ladies whom they may have marked as their prey. The broad rule is this; that no man should enter the doors of a house till he is asked to do so, if not by words then by one of the intimations common in society. The obvious exception is this, that in the case of new comers to any place, residents, whether personally acquainted with them or not, may properly call or leave cards on them, if so disposed. The stranger is of course desirous of knowing people in the place to which he may have come but it does not follow that the residents possibly contented with the social arrangements with which they may be provided, are desirous of knowing the stranger. By this system, moreover, it would be possible to do away with the ridiculous incongruity of the existing plan, the calls of unknown men on puzzled and bewildered ladies.

The Loss of the "Fairlight."

We regret to learn that the ship Fairlight from Hongkong to San Francisco has been lost with a large number of Chinese passengers. The news is communicated by the Vice-Consul at Tamsuy, under date 25th of June to a firm in this colony, in the following words:—

I have been requested by Mr. Busch master of the late British ship Fairlight, to communicate to you and request you to report in the papers, the melancholy intelligence of the loss of that vessel, and consequently in an indirect manner with his welfare in the next. The social relations, on which the ease and pleasure of life depend to so large an extent turn upon the proper comprehension of this subject and a proper reverence for it is the beginning. In one word, the subject is which we include in good manners, and that revelation must be followed by an acknowledgement of its enormous importance. The word is—calls.

People very often pay no regard to what are described as the trivialities of life. It is thought that if a man is hard working in business, absorbed in the pursuits of one of those things which make life pleasant, —money,—he is not only justified, but rather than others wise praiseworthy in treating "trifles" with contempt, and by a curious oversight, it is assumed that matters which have reference to the social relations, are trifles as compared with the acquisition of what Wemmick calls "portable property." As a matter of fact one of the greatest advantages of wealth is that it does to some extent give a man the power of establishing whatever social relations he pleases with the rest of the world, and if this is merely the end of money-getting, then it is monstously absurd to greet it with contempt as a trifle during the process. It is doubly absurd because if a man treats it as a trifle while he is engaged with the "serious business" of life, he will find himself incapacitated when the reward is reached at last from having any social relations at all. Looking away from this little place, we see in London thousands of men, young or of middle age as the case may be, to whom the gift of making money has been altogether denied, but on whom Fortune has as if in compensation bestowed the don de plaire in a reasonable degree and to whom consequently some apparently of themselves social advantages which money could not buy. There are many and many rich men who have done with the serious business of life, and who turn to the "trifles" for the pleasure of their later life, and find to their wonder and grim discontent that those trifles are not to be had for the manner for the careless asking, of those who have treated them with contempt for thirty years. A SUBJECT of the deepest importance is broached in the columns of the Shanghai Recorder; a subject on which the earnest attention of all persons who deserve the name of civilised beings should be steadily concentrated until a satisfactory result is worked out. We do not refer to consular misdeeds, the mismanagement of colonial affairs, the injudicious conduct of the Minister at Pekin, not even to the mighty interests involved in the state of the market for Grey Shirtings. The subject which the Shanghai Recorder boldly grasps is one which is closely bound up with our connection in this world, with each man's contentment in that sphere in which it has pleased Providence to place him, and consequently in an indirect manner with his welfare in the next. The social relations, on which the ease and pleasure of life depend to so large an extent turn upon the proper comprehension of this subject and a proper reverence for it is the beginning. In one, word, the subject is which we include in good manners, and that revelation must be followed by an acknowledgement of its enormous importance. The word is—calls.

With the full knowledge of a civilised system, however, the communities of Hongkong and apparently of Shanghai, have deliberately adopted one which is the most barbarous and idiotic that could possibly be devised. Not alone is the time fixed for calling, one at which it is quite impossible to enjoy the leisurely feeling so necessary to the pleasure of such a visit, but strangers are actually expected to call first on residents. New comers are expected to go about thrusting themselves into unknown houses and the presence of ladies to whom they have never been introduced, like so many Paul Pry's "hoping they don't intrude" Men accustomed to that delicate regard for other people's feelings which is at the foundation of true social etiquette, would rather give up without society altogether than do this. The hours and rules meanwhile will shoulder their way about and give horrible annoyances to unfortunate ladies whom they may have marked as their prey. The broad rule is this; that no man should enter the doors of a house till he is asked to do so, if not by words then by one of the intimations common in society. The obvious exception is this, that in the case of new comers to any place, residents, whether personally acquainted with them or not, may properly call or leave cards on them, if so disposed. The stranger is of course desirous of knowing people in the place to which he may have come but it does not follow that the residents possibly contented with the social arrangements with which they may be provided, are desirous of knowing the stranger. By this system, moreover, it would be possible to do away with the ridiculous incongruity of the existing plan, the calls of unknown men on puzzled and bewildered ladies.

The Loss of the "Fairlight."

We regret to learn that the ship Fairlight from Hongkong to San Francisco has been lost with a large number of Chinese passengers. The news is communicated by the Vice-Consul at Tamsuy, under date 25th of June to a firm in this colony, in the following words:—

I have been requested by Mr. Busch master of the late British ship Fairlight, to communicate to you and request you to report in the papers, the melancholy intelligence of the loss of that vessel, and consequently in an indirect manner with his welfare in the next. The social relations, on which the ease and pleasure of life depend to so large an extent turn upon the proper comprehension of this subject and a proper reverence for it is the beginning. In one, word, the subject is which we include in good manners, and that revelation must be followed by an acknowledgement of its enormous importance. The word is—calls.

People very often pay no regard to what are described as the trivialities of life. It is thought that if a man is hard working in business, absorbed in the pursuits of one of those things which make life pleasant, —money,—he is not only justified, but rather than others wise praiseworthy in treating "trifles" with contempt, and by a curious oversight, it is assumed that matters which have reference to the social relations, are trifles as compared with the acquisition of what Wemmick calls "portable property." As a matter of fact one of the greatest advantages of wealth is that it does to some extent give a man the power of establishing whatever social relations he pleases with the rest of the world, and if this is merely the end of money-getting, then it is monstously absurd to greet it with contempt as a trifle during the process. It is doubly absurd because if a man treats it as a trifle while he is engaged with the "serious business" of life, he will find himself incapacitated when the reward is reached at last from having any social relations at all. Looking away from this little place, we see in London thousands of men, young or of middle age as the case may be, to whom the gift of making money has been altogether denied, but on whom Fortune has as if in compensation bestowed the don de plaire in a reasonable degree and to whom consequently some apparently of themselves social advantages which money could not buy. There are many and many rich men who have done with the serious business of life, and who turn to the "trifles" for the pleasure of their later life, and find to their wonder and grim discontent that those trifles are not to be had for the manner for the careless asking, of those who have treated them with contempt for thirty years. It is very disastrous no doubt to pay no attention to making money during the prime of life, or to let the cultivation of society absorb the larger share of time, but if a man intends to do more than leave his money to a hospital and die, when he has made it, then it is also disastrous to neglect society altogether and prepare inevitably for mouldy warfare with it in the later period of life.

This in vindication of the importance of that matter to which attention is called by the article we have already mentioned. Do not let people treat the decent courtesies of life as of no moment, or as if it was of no moment, whether they are done this way or that way. It is very important indeed that whatever society we take, may be taken in the right way. It means just the difference, very often between a pleasant, enjoyable life, of which the time is agreeably filled and one of discontent and wearisome ennui. But some one may say "society is all very well, but you are talking of calls and of all the——hores I know of calls are the worst. "The blanks would be filled up to a certain extent in accordance with the sex and habits of the speaker, but the meaning conveyed would be upon these no doubt. The fact that people have this hatred of calls, is the great proof that they are clumsily managed, because if society is pleasant, these it is peculiarly pleasant to take it at that house and at that time which suits you best. When you go to a house by invitation it may be pleasant to do so or it may be the reverse, but even if it be pleasant there is this awkward feeling about the pleasure up to the moment that you enter on it, that you cannot be sure whether when the appointed moment comes you will be inclined for it or no. The call therefore which you pay when the inclination is upon you and which at any moment can be abridged at your pleasure, ought to be the most natural, easy and agreeable form in which society can be taken. The call need not be a bore, but on the contrary may be a refined and highly civilised form of entertainment, and when it is otherwise there is something radically wrong about the local rules by which it is governed.

We say the local rules because while the most important points connected with the conduct of civilised man amongst his fellows, are as it were regulated by world wide laws, the social statutes relating to calls differ very widely in different countries. In some parts of Germany nothing is commoner than for people who have to attend a ball in the evening to take advantage of the careful toilet they have made, to drop in at half dozen houses on the way, and discharges their little debts of ofiicity by candle light. In London of course certain hours of the afternoon are clearly recognised as those in which calls may be made and there is a perfect understand ng as to the evenes which give people a right to call, or make it incumbent on them to call as the case may be, at certain houses. Most people probably who have any acquaintance with the ways of life in continental capitals would agree that on the whole the London system is by far the best. As the English common law is said to be, the London calling system is, the perfection of reason. It rarely requires a man to call at a house where he does not want to go, and rarely makes it possible for him to go to a house where he is not wanted. It enables him to attend to the work of the day whatever it may be, and then pay his calls at leisure, sipping them as it were, and enjoying them as a man who has dined and is at peace with the world may enjoy good claret. With the full knowledge of a civilised system, however, the communities of Hongkong and apparently of Shanghai, have deliberately adopted one which is the most barbarous and idiotic that could possibly be devised. Not alone is the time fixed for calling, one at which it is quite impossible to enjoy the leisurely feeling so necessary to the pleasure of such a visit, but strangers are actually expected to call first on residents. New comers are expected to go about thrusting themselves into unknown houses and the presence of ladies to whom they have never been introduced, like so many Paul Pry's "hoping they don't intrude" Men accustomed to that delicate regard for other people's feelings which is at the foundation of true social etiquette, would rather give up without society altogether than do this. By this system, moreover, it would be possible to do away with the ridiculous incongruity of the existing plan, the calls of unknown men on puzzled and bewildered ladies.

A SUBJECT of the deepest importance is broached in the columns of the Shanghai Recorder; a subject on which the earnest attention of all persons who deserve the name of civilised beings should be steadily concentrated until a satisfactory result is worked out. We do not refer to consular misdeeds, the mismanagement of colonial affairs, the injudicious conduct of the Minister at Pekin, not even to the mighty interests involved in the state of the market for Grey Shirtings. The subject which the Shanghai Recorder boldly grasps is one which is closely bound up with our connection in this world, with each man's contentment in that sphere in which it has pleased Providence to place him, and consequently in an indirect manner with his welfare in the next. The social relations, on which the ease and pleasure of life depend to so large an extent turn upon the proper comprehension of this subject and a proper reverence for it is the beginning. In one, word, the subject is which we include in good manners, and that revelation must be followed by an acknowledgement of its enormous importance. The word is—calls.

LATEST INTELLIGENCE.

THE MAIL.

Austria Evacuated Holstein.

The Benares arrived this morning with the London mails of the 26th of May, but the news has been to a great extent anticipated by the telegrams already received. The telegraphic dates only extend to the 12th of June and one message only of that date is fresh. This is as follows:—

LONDON, 12th June.

Cotton steady.

Austria energetically repelled accusation of Prussia.

Circular issued proposed mobilization of Federal contingent.

Austria evacuated Holstein.

There was a rumour at Galle of another telegram to the 13th, which stated that Garibaldi had entered Venetia, but this was said to have been a hoax.

The papers of the 26th are occupied with the approaching congress; in the speculations concerning which we can scarcely be interested now, when the ultimate failure of the conference is known. The House of Commons having adjourned from the 18th to the 24th for the Whitsuntide Races, the papers to-day do not contain parliamentary intelligence worth speaking of.

The mobilized army of Italy numbers 240,000 men. The fleet was to leave Taranto on the 25th for the Adriatic, to protect a landing by Garibaldi and his volunteers, but operations were not to commence till the 29th. The Chamber of Deputies having voted the tax on Italian rente by a majority of two, the Finance Minister tendered his resignation, but withdrew it in the expectation that this measure would be rejected by the Senate.

America.

The latest news from America is to the 15th of May as follows:—

President Johnson having sent to the Senate his veto on the Bill forcing Colorado into a State, that body adjourned without reading the message which the press pronounce to be an insult to the President. In the House of Representatives Mr. Chandler offered a resolution declaring the President's course to be pernicious and unconstitutional, but the House rejected it by 82 votes against 52, and passed a resolution censuring its proposer for needlessly giving them a gross result. Mr. Davis's trial will take place early in June, and Chief Justice Chase will preside, on condition the martial-law is abrogated so far as the district court of Virginia is concerned. Mr. Davis's health is rapidly failing, and the President has ordered the rigour of his confinement to be immediately relaxed. General Santa Anna has arrived in Washington, and denies that he is acting in connivance with the Emperor Maximilian. Stephens has addressed a Fenian mass-meeting, declaring that money is necessary and must be obtained. He has been visited by General Hooker. Quid, on the morning of the 14th, 130½. Exchanges on London, 143. Cotton Low-ordinary middling upland 35c.

THE CHARTERED MERCANTILE BANK.

The annual meeting took place on the 16th of May.

The Chairman, in moving the customary complimentary resolution, expressed interest that, according to the deed of settlement, the directors had been unable to meet the shareholders until that day, inasmuch as they would have been glad to have given them, at an earlier period, the assurance that there was no ground whatever for the pressure depreciated price of their shares, and he was very sorry if any shareholders had been induced to part with their property at a price so much below its real value. There was no reason whatever for alarm, and he trusted that the proprietors would not sell their shares at the depreciated value at which they now stand. (Hear, hear.) The figures in the accounts did not require much explanation. The current and fixed deposits were almost the same as they were in the previous year, which was a favourable feature. The business of the present year promised exceedingly well. Two exchanges in India took a favourable turn towards the end of last year, but to late to benefit the operations of the year, but was a contributing powerfully to assist the operations of the present year. The profits since the 1st of January had been exceedingly large and to every respectable the business of the bank was progressing satisfactorily. During the last year there had been but little movement in the exchanges in China. They had since improved, and taking India and China together the prospect of the exchanges was most favourable. Then he was happy to be able to assure them that there was no progress at up to the present time of any loss or threat, beyond they held a few bills of Overend, Gurney's and of Barnard's; but those of Overend Gurney, and Co. were fully provided for, and those of Barned were covered by good names, so that no loss was likely to result. Looking to the state of affairs in India he did not an apprehension any danger, except, perhaps, at Bombay, where a monetary crisis was probable. But there they had now a manager of great ability and prudence, who was carrying out the orders of the directors with discretion and judgment. The local business they had at Bombay was now a mere trifle, and the advantage made by that branch were almost exclusively on Government securities, so that any risk it carried there was fully provided for. A telegram received from Bombay, dated the 9th of the month, was "Several native firms in difficulty; we are clear"—(hear, hear)—and no doubt they would continue to receive unsatisfactory accounts from that place, but he repeated that they stood to lose nothing" at Bombay.

THE BANK OF HINDUSTAN.

The general meeting was held on the 24th.

The CHAIRMAN, in moving the adoption of the report, said that it would have been very unreasonable in the directors to have had the power in their report to form a strong contrast with the one which had been presented by most of the Indian banks of late. He was, however, sorry to say that they were in the same dilemma, but he hoped not to be able to give the same unsatisfactory explanation of their position. It was true they had lost a considerable sum of money; but they were still in a safe position, and able to continue the business to the advantage of the shareholders. When the managers in the East were appointed they had every instruction from the directors as to the business in which they were to embark; but whether or not they were carried away by that spirit of speculation which was rife he could not say, but there certainly had been the greatest recklessness carried on in China and Bengal which was adverse to the interests of the bank, and which they had no power to counteract, inasmuch, as it did not come to their knowledge until it was too late. They stood at the close of the year 1865 with a loss actually ascertained to the amount of £87,000. That was a very serious loss, and one which they must deeply regretted. In addition to this there was a further loss of £70,000, which it was intended would have been covered by securities which were then in process of realization. But, since that time they had found out that further loss, which would raise the total loss to nearly £150,000. That would cover the extreme of everything, for they had taken everything in its worst possible light, and there were many items which had been set down as positive losses which might not turn out so. With regard to the state of the shares in the market, he might call their attention to that unhappy crisis which had affected almost every bank and other commercial concern, as being the chief cause. They had very good credit in India and were doing a safe business. It was true that they might have been doing more business, but for some time in China they had been drawing back from loans as which was now being satisfactorily carried forward. The branch at Calcutta had for some time had a considerable portion of their capital locked up. The manager had been called home to give explanations, with which the board was not satisfied, inasmuch as they saw that it was carried in advances which he had made which were a big capital up. They again sent him out with instructions to realize, but they found that he took no steps whatever to do so. That manager had been discharged, and another agent in his stead who had a through knowledge of the affairs of the East.

It was decidedly both the general meetings half-yearly in future.

Women's Friendships.

It happened some years ago in a school carried on according to the ancient Gilbertine principle, admitting scholars of both sexes, that the boys and the girls carried on their studies on opposite sides of a curtain. A hole was one day found in the curtain, which was clearly not the work of accident. It was ruled by common consent to be a sort of Tous-Jades, at least as undeveloped and infantine form of that institution. But then a great question arose which was not so easy to solve. The curtain was clearly torn by the dwellers on one side of it in order to see straight of the dwellers on the other. But on which side was it torn? Did the boys tear it in to look at the girls, or did the girls tear it to look at the boys? Opinions were divided, both as to the evidence of the fact and as to its à priori probabilities. Indeed we believe that the arguments on the two sides were so equally balanced that no positive conclusion was ever come to, and the culprits, of whichever sex, remained unpunished.

Now, if the child be the father of the man, and, we suppose, by the same logic, the mother of the woman, there is surely a moral in this story. It surely means something more than that people of each sex like to look at one another, even from early childhood. This surely something more than the mere pleasure of staring at anything which ought not to be looked at, or generally of doing anything which ought not to be done. It seems to point, of course in the most childish and undeveloped form, to something beyond mere general curiosity, or the mere general interest of one sex in the other. It is a childish example of special form of those feelings. It points to the curiosity of men to know what women do when they are by themselves, and to the counter feeling, which we take for granted exists also—the curiosity of women to know what men do when they are by themselves. Such a curiosity certainly does exist on one side, and we think we can hardly be wrong in taking it granted that it exists at least as strongly on the other side. Such a curiosity, like most other forms of curiosity, may be either frivolous or rational, according to the form which it takes and the objects at which it aims.

As curiosity of this sort can, we suspect, never be fully gratified. Something may perhaps be got by each sex out of novels written by the other. But we know on one side, and we suspect on the other, that this takes us a very little way indeed. Really to learn anything in this way we must wait for the ideal novel, which is to contain nothing but what really happened, and which will therefore be unanimously set down as the most improbable and unnatural of all novels. More may doubtless be got by diligent cross-questioning of brothers and sisters, and still more of husbands and wives. But even this does not carry us very far. There is a sort of point of honour on each side which hinders either side from ever getting to the bottom of the matter. How much can a man ever find out of his own wife's doings and feelings when she was a girl? Very little, we fancy in most cases. And supposing he does learn a little more than usual, think how limited is his field of inquiry. Most men have the chance of knowing one or two women, or at most two, on such a point. To be sure, setting Oil-stain aside, Charles the Great and Henry the Eighth had greater opportunities in this way than most men. But did they use them? Of Charles we can say nothing either way. Henry, we suppose, tried and broke down. Indeed he learned so little from one of his wives on the most important point of all that he had a special Act of Parliament passed to make all future Queens—pity he did not add all future wives of all ranks—incommunicative.

It is perhaps merely an idle curiosity to ask what women talk about when they are together—whether, when they have retired to the drawing-room in the evening, or again in those more early meetings when men are at work they talk only of worsted work and croquet parties, or whether they talk of anything better or of anything worse. But it is by no means an idle curiosity to consider what is the exact influence which women have upon one another, what is the nature of friendship among them, and how far it differs from friendship as it is understood among men. Of course on such a subject we can speak only for the most part à priori. If our conjectures are right, so much the better; if they are wrong, it does not greatly matter; if only some public-spirited lady will, in such a case, come forward and correct our mistakes.

Each sex, we suppose we may assume is primarily made for the other; and we venture to think with the Apostle that the woman is, to a special extent, made for the man. Till Bloomerism, or whatever the movements to be called has given us female generals, judges, bishops, and Cabinet Ministers, we suppose we may take this for granted. When Byron tells us that love is not a felt hyphen in any sort of hardship, while we feel quite sure that woman would feel the reversal of the rule to be a great hardship. In England at least no man wants to kiss his friend, to call him all manner of affectionate names, to sit with him for hours by his bedroom fire. But these are just the things which women intensely enjoy, and, we may add, just the thing which men intensely dislike to see them enjoy. In fact a woman will behave to another woman exactly in the way in which a man would behave except to a wife or a mistress; and therefore when such demonstrations of affection are made openly, they produce the same unpleasant feeling as similar demonstrations on the part of married people or lovers. One wish is in all these cases that the affectionate persons would keep their affection within bounds till they are alone and can do what they please. No man likes to see two women kiss one another; he wishes they would put off the caressing till they are safe by the bedroom fire, till their dressing gown is on and their back hair down. And indeed no man wishes the existence of this last privilege to be in any way cancelled or paraded in his sight and hearing. Except in the case of a married man whose wife gives off to chatter with her friend or sister, it does him no harm, but still he does not like it. If a man dislikes to see two women kiss one another, it does not at all imply that he would like to take the place of one of them, and kiss the other himself. No doubt, if such be the case, the feeling is height ened; but it exists even though both women are totally indifferent to him. To no one do people like to see an ostentatious display of privileges from which they are debarred, even though they do not feel the being debarred to be any kind of loss.

What then, in the general effect of women's intercourse with one another. We once heard a wish expressed for an Act of Parliament to hinder any woman from speaking to any other woman. This was doubtless carrying the thing much too far, but, as with most strong sayings there is surely an element of truth at the bottom of the exaggeration. We suspect that the relations of women to one another their demonstrative attachments, their mysterious upstairs conversations, are all grounded on the weaker parts of their characters, and are likely, so to speak, to strengthen their weaknesses, instead of communicating any better and stronger elements. Again we see the woman who created for the man; and though of course the highest form of this relation is marriage, the position is true of all relations of kindred and society between men and women. Of course we do not mean that the mother is not, in many points, the best guardian of her daughters; but we do mean that in most cases a woman will gain more improvement in every way from the society of rational men than from that of any members of her own sex. Next to husband and wife, the relation of brother and sister is the highest case of this, but the rule applies in some degree to the relations of kind ed and friendship generally. Woman's friendship seems to be bounded, like the friend hip of men, mainly on more particularly in pleasures and amusements, much less than on real mutual admiration of character, or on co-operation in some sort of real work or other.—Saturday Review.
